Scratching the surface ielts answer

IELTSDATA READ PASSAGE 69-Scratching the Surface.

----- They cause itching, pungent and creeping sensations in the skin that are almost intractable. These creatures can only exist in the mind, but their effects are real and infectious. The classic case occurred in an American laboratory in 1966. After installing the new equipment, workers began to suffer from itching and sensations of insects crawling over them. The complaints multiplied and the problem, attributed to the disabled, began to spread to the relatives of the victims. A concerted effort was made to exterminate the mites using everything from DDT and mothballs to insecticide and rat poison. Nothing worked. In-depth examination by scientific investigators could not identify parasites or even signs of real parasitic attacks. However, they found small Rockwool insulation particles in the air, which could cause skin irritation. A cleaning program was introduced and the staff was assured that the problem had been solved. The cable myth infestation is missing.-----

----- Another case of 1960 occurred in a textile factory, where workers complained of being moved by insects brought into factory in imported cloth. Dermatitis crossed the workforce, but followed a curious model to influence people in a particular part of the factory, insects seemed to be transmitted through the social groups of employees. No parasite could be found. A third infestation spread through the office staff who crossed dust records that were intact for decades. They have attributed their skin problems to 'acari card', but the cause has been traced to the irritation from paper splinter.-----

----- These are all cases of parasite illusions, where something in the environment is misinterpreted as an insect or another parasite. Everyone has heard of delirium tremens when alcoholics or amphetamine users experience the feeling of insects crawling on their skin, but other factors can cause the same illusion. Static electricity, dust, fibers and chemical solvents can all give rise to imaginary insects. The interesting thing is they spread. The infectious nature of this illusion seems to be a kind of contagious reflection. Yawn and others start yawning. If everyone around you laugh, laugh. Start scratching, and even colleagues will scratch. * Dr. Paul Marsden is director of the Journal of Memetics, the study of infectious ideas. He suggests that this type of group behavior may have played a role in human evolution. In our distant past, a single scratch would have warned others that there were bite insects or parasites present. This would affect them to scratch their own itch. Anyone have been bitten several times by mosquitoes before they realize that they will recognize the evolutionary value of this type of early warning, the burst of mass scratch can also promote the mutual spouse, which is important in the necessary bond of primate groups, the problem comes when the contagion reflex is not linked to a real threat. normally, everyone soon would stop scratching, but people can unconsciously exaggerate symptoms to get attention, or because they get a break from unappealing work. laboratory workers were scanners, which spent the day laboriously examining the results of bubble chamber tests; textile workers and clerical personnel who were dealing with records would also find what they had to do quite boring, add the factor that the skin conditions are notoriously susceptible to psychological influence, and it is easy to see how a group dynamic can keep the parasites running. treatment of the condition is difficult because few will accept that their bad reading of symptoms is the result of what psychologists call an hysterical condition. in the past, the combination of irritants and expert reassurance was sufficient. However, these days, there is a lack of conventional medicine and easier access to support groups, the suffering can strengthen the illusions of others on the internet, exchange stories of elusive mites that battle science, this could give rise to an epidemic of mysterious parasites, which spread from mind to mind as a kind of super virus an awareness of the power of illusion can stop it. Now you can stop scratching. Scratching the Surface Questions 1-5 Classify declarations 1-5 second if they apply to A. Lab B. Factory C. Office 1.
